TRUMP ARRESTED

I think something happened to Donald Trump who used to be the president and he used to be on a talk show or something. I saw this picture of him online at a jail and he really did not look happy at all. He claims it was due to a perfect phone call which I don't understand because since when is making a perfect phone call illegal I called my brother a few days ago and I wanted to see if the voicemail transcriber thing that Apple does would put emojis in there so I said troll emoji troll emoji laughing emoji laughing crying emoji but unfortunately it did not work. Rudy giuliani also went to jail I think.

GUARDIANS PREVIEW

vs. Rangers (9/15–9/17):

I like these guys. They are another historically bad team that has had a really strong season which is always fun to see. They were way out in front in their division for a while but have been tanking lately, I do hope they can get it together and make the playoffs. I imagine they'll at least make a wildcard slot unless they totally blow it. I don't know a whole lot about them but they destroyed us last time we played. They have some sick City Connect jerseys. They're playing the twins and just got beat bad and it would be nice if they could beat them instead :)

@ Royals (9/18–9/20):

For as long as I've been paying attention to baseball these guys have been exceptionally terrible. They won the world series in 2015 and then immediately collapsed and are not getting any better. It is very cool that they won and I would like to look more into that and figure out what is going on with them. I think they're basically just poor, but so are lots of other teams who do a lot better. We play these guys constantly and it's always just filler. I hope they have a good season soon. Our division is so boring.

vs. Orioles (9/21-9/24):

Love these guys. They are definitely the second best team in baseball right now and I'm very happy for them. This past decade they were the absolute worst of the worst and they have totally turned it around. Lots of incredibly talented rookie players on very cheap contracts that are gonna stick around for a while. These guys are awesome. I have tickets for their September 21st game and I'm very excited to see them play. They're also the only sports team in existence that has the same exact name as a real animal, the Baltimore Oriole. The Toronto Blue Jays or Minnesota Timberwolves don't count because that's just an existing animal with a city name stuck in front of it but the Baltimore Oriole is the actual name of the bird. And what a great bird it is. And what a good team they are. I really hope they make it to the world series. I will be rooting for them. Also a good friend of mine is from Annapolis and through my friendship with her I gain a connection to this team. I was in Baltimore when 9/11 happened as well. Go Orioles!

vs. Reds (9/26–9/27):

The Reds are cool. Elly De La Cruz is a very exciting player. Whenever I think about these guys I'm really struck with how foreign and disparate Cincinnati feels as a northeasterner. I don't feel any connection to these guys. I mean they're from Ohio, and I'm from Ohio. But they don't represent me. I am really interested in finding the line where Cincinnati influence begins and the Cleveland zone ends. It has got to be somewhere south of Columbus. Regionalism is an endlessly entertaining subject to think about. It makes sense. 4 hours is a very significant drive that no one really wants to take without good reason. There's not much connection between anyone here and anyone down there. People drive to Columbus all the time, people are always going to Pittsburgh or Athens or Detroit but no one goes to Cincinnati. It's just too far. Why care about them?

@ Tigers (9/29–10/01):

Okay. It's the Tigers. By this point we will have known for a while if we will make the playoffs or not and the most likely situation is that our season has been over for a week at this point and we are just playing it out. Boring team that I don't really have much to say about. They're a really old team from a Midwest city, which I like. I don't know much about them. They are quite bad this year. It would be very cool if we are in a position here where these wins could mean something. Whatever.

DEAR HARRY

HELLO, harrison good day to you. The sun is bright and you are loved. Bask in gods bountiful glory! And accept yourself as the sweet prize of god you are!!! - W.H.

Dear W.H.,

Many thanks to you on this wonderful day. So commonly in this life we are faced with negativity—making comments like these all the more impactful. I'll take the opportunity provided to me by this beautiful comment to address my adoring fans. To all of you loyal readers—bask in the example set forth by your fellow human. Take today to do something nice! Smile at your barista, shake an old guy's hand, look the other way while someone shoplifts from Walmart—the possibilities are endless. There is more than enough sorrow and hatred in our world. Do your part to add a little sunshine.

I'm under a lot of stress to not be a disappointment of my family. I want to keep doing what I love but it's getting hard to enjoy it when I feel so bad about from everyone else. Should I just quit? - A random gorl

Dear random gorl,

I'm sorry to hear that you're feeling like this. Disappointment is a difficult concept. We often feel as if we are letting down the people in our life, but this emotion frequently comes from a place of self-doubt. Have your family members expressed a sense of disappointment to you? If they haven't, what makes you feel as if they would? Some reflection can reveal where these feelings truly originate from. I would also urge you to look past your detractors. Why not focus on those who push you to follow your dreams? There is nothing about negative feedback that makes it inherently more valuable than its positive counterpart. Do what you feel is best for yourself—after all, you're the one living your life.

Mr. Sheetz,

On behalf of the editorial board of harryrosenberg.net, I write to you today with an urgent plea. In recent years, it has become harder and harder to find quality alcoholic beverages in stores. While every gas station and convenience store alike carry brands such as Budweiser and Corona, very few carry those that Midwestern Americans have grown to love. Blatz Beer is one of these brands. It is nigh impossible to find a cold, refreshing Blatz in most communities. You, Mr. Sheetz, and your company have come to represent a new force in the realm of food and beverage purchasing. I urge you to utilize that power by carrying Blatz beer in your stores - not just for the betterment of your brand, but for the betterment of our society.

Sincerely,

Harry Rosenberg
